THE EXHIBITION SCHUMACHER

For his first solo exhibition in France, Ben Schumacher will pursue his collaborative work with architects. In the frame of this exhibition in Lyon he has been working in New York for the period of one month applying to an open call architecture competition with a young architect (so this time not with a big firm).

This exhibition will involve designing a structure and producing drawings, 3D models, physical models and renderings of the project. The source of interest for the design building will be networks, analytics, statistics and causality as represented aesthetically in the contemporary fields of mathematics, biology and architecture.

This results from those fields of research and execution and from the manner they utilize systems theory, cybernetics and networks discourse as a way to deal with and explain real events as they are happening and how they might become useful to either produce something or to become predictive of future events.

The key figure of the billiard table will form the foundation for this metaphor. Schumacher started to think about the billiard table as a building - maybe for example the possibility of the top being a park or green space - a natural space versus chaos on the top with the movement of the balls with the the rational grid of city below it. And then the interior of the table where the balls go after they have been sunk - this becomes the origin, the organs of the structure alluding to the infrastructure that upholds the city or the «game».

THE ARTIST

SCHUMACHER

Ben Schumacher was born in 1985 in Kitchener (Canada) where he studied architecture at Waterloo University. After working for several architectural agencies, he studied Fine Arts in New York (where he has since been living and working).

From his brief experience as an architect he has retained a great interest in diagrams, notes and drawings, as well as for maquettes, samples of materials and the many different communications media, which are more or less developed in terms of graphics, and techniques of printing and reproduction.

Programmatic

What has held Schumacher's attention and is still actively informing his artistic praxis is, in the end, looking more into the abstract side of the architect's profession, and more particularly the production methods of architecture assisted or entirely produced by computer programming and artificial intelligence software. The jargon common to computer programming and contemporary architecture (for example the cloud, the hub, the conditional connection and the lazy evaluation), otherwise put, what nowadays organizes all the virtual and physical spaces surrounding us, becomes poetic, provided that you do not know anything, or much, about it, and that you decide, like Schumacher, to un-learn it in order to better and differently re-learn it.

Speculative

Hypothesis and anticipation are the bases of today's architectural and urbanistic production, responding to a concern for optimal rationalization and efficiency. With each development of one of the parameters, be it financial, technical, human or other, the machine re-calculates the different possibilities for which the architect will be able to opt. This computer processing of the large number of data contingent to each project is probably what fascinates Schumacher the most, and the thing he decides to grapple with against the grain. So he makes a game out of it (whose cause-effect links, for him, are comparable to a game of billiards): for his sculptures and installations, he uses part of the excess matter produced by large architectural firms and agencies, and even regularly delegates part of the creative process of his exhibitions and works directly to an architect.

Looped

The appropriation of what architects and computer scientists commonly call speculative execution is a means for Schumacher of appropriating for himself a programmatic world where one of the main challenges is data management. Memorization, storage and extraction of data carried out by calculations of probabilities are computer movements which, these days, do not only dominate architecture, but also, for example, finance and the production of the smallest object, be it mass-produced or made by luxury craftsmanship. In tandem with the tangible and concrete counterpart represented by 3D prints, the samples of materials and the quantified data delivered en bloc which Schumacher retrieves, and the quest for the absolute optimization of architecture in everything that is mathematical and abstract about it, have something dizzy-making about them, infinitely beautiful, absurd and at the same time scary. The Canadian artist's works also and not unwittingly point out that today's speculative execution paradoxically links up with the frenzied side of the project and utopian architecture of the 1960s and 1970s which, for ideologically reverse reasons, combined imagination, anticipation, hybridization and modulation ad infinitum, particularly in response to permanent information flows.
